KADDERLY: Here in Washington, we have some information for you on rabies. And we have the bulletin board....Which Ruth Van Deman is ready to give you now...Ruth....

VAN DEMAN: The War Food Administration has just announced that civilian consumers will get more tuna and tuna-like fish from the 1943 pack than we had previously expected. It's about 25 million pounds more. The entire production of canned tuna and tuna-like fishes, packed from today on will be available to civilians. Until now packers have been required to reserve three-fifths of the canned tuna for the Government.

The news about potatoes is much different than we had a short time ago. Now the Food Administration is urging consumers to eat more potatoes....new potatoes. The southern producing regions are shipping them in large amounts. The early potatoes don't store well for a long period and should be used, to prevent waste. The Food Administration has assured producers it intends to provide full support to the potato market through purchase operations.

Last on the bulletin board is news about custom slaughtering of meat. After July first, anyone slaughtering animals for other persons must have a permit--either the regular permit that entitles a person to slaughter and sell meat, of a special custom slaughtering permit.

The county war meat Committees of the war boards issue permits.

KADDERLY: Thank you, Ruth Van Deman.
